That bridge on the crossing at Winkler's new store is in a fearfully dilapidated condition, and is fraught with danger to every passer-by. It is situated in the most frequently traveled thoroughfare in our little city, and it is a shame and a reproach to the authorities. Let the shame and reproach be wiped out at once, and a new bridge replace the old, which has done good and faithful service in its day.

The Accommodation was filled with passengers by the time it reached Pilot Knobthe second station and two miles from the starting point-Tuesday morning. The stations farther on are represented to have been "black with people" awaiting its comfrom other directions, we'll wager a summer hat that St. Louis was just a little fuller fof people than ever it was before. And, no doubt, some of the people were "full," tooof enthusiasm, we mean.

We suggest to the city authorities that the condition of affairs on Main Street after nine o'clock at night is simply disgraceful. Cannot the "street-walkers" be made to assume the decency of privacy, at least, instead of flaunting their vices into the faces of men, women and children who are obliged to traverse the streets after darkness has settled upon the town? If the marshal will run a few of the delinquents in, and with them some of the gilded youth who follow them, it will be a salutary lesson.
